It's the 65th anniversary of the first battle between the US Military and aliens over Roswell NM in 1947. That's as good of a story as any. It might explain the many trillions spent on "defense" since. Surely the critics who say we have just been supporting the lifestyles of a few hundred millionaires with all that money are wrong.

After all, President Eisenhower gave several speeches warning us against dangers the Alien Industrial Complex, and how we needed massive diversions of money away from schools and hospitals to combat it.

The original press release stating that the US Army Air Force had recovered alien wreckage and bodies was surprisingly detailed. The transition to the independent USAF wouldn't happen until September that year. The massive cover-up in the press that began the next day was simply unbelievable. They could have said it was just a practical joke that got out of hand, cashiered the major responsible for the story going to the local newspaper and ended it there. But instead they told an obvious lie.

Was it simply that the generals were terrified to admit that anything issued by the military press office could be a lie? We were already into the Cold War, and lying to the public was the entire thrust of that "patriotic" movement.

The cover-up produced at great expensive by the USAF decades later was an even bigger lie than the original weather balloon story. They broadcast films from a test program intended to work out the design of high altitude pilot ejection parachutes. This operation used dummies in USAF flight suits dropped from high altitude balloons, this explained away the alien bodies from the original official Army press release. There are enough facts in the story so-far to point that out as a lie. Do you get it? The uniforms don't match, the USAF had their own by the time the film was made, seven years later. They had no idea that they would ever be bailing out at high altitudes in 1947.

Why not tell another lie, and use fake evidence to back it up? Nothing new about that. Were there little green men at Roswell? We'll never know, unless the little green men tell us. But their military is probably run by even more advanced liars than ours.
