

Glenn Greenwald's description of the common liberal sentiment that "Bush's secrecy theories and assertions of unchallengeable executive power were grave and tyrannical threats to liberty" is spot-on. But as Greenwald notes, these same assertions of power and privilege are no less grave in the Obama administration. The similarities between the Obama administration's response to the 9th Circuit Court's ruling in the Al-Haramain case, requiring the government to turn over classified information and the legal views espoused under the Bush-Cheney administration by the likes of John Yoo and David Addington are simply stunning.

We didn't elect President Obama to preserve the Bush administration's anti-constitutional executive power grab. We elected him to end it.
