

So bad is the situation that the medical industry will not allow patients to try something else, even when doctors admit to the family that they can do nothing more; that the only thing they can do is keep the patient comfortable. What could be the harm whatever a family does for someone who is terminal? The danger is that if it isn't "approved," by "consensus," etc., it could work. If it works, the "traditional" therapy could be in trouble, which could break the monopoly and endanger the take.
