

Pundit Tucker Carlson is expressing regret for voicing support for President Trump.

Carlson, who has been a sharp critic of Trump's war in Iran, said during a recent episode of his podcast and online show that prominent people on the right who backed Trump ahead of the 2024 election are "implicated" in what's going on in the Middle East.

"So I do think it's like a moment to wrestle with our own consciences. You know, we'll be tormented by it for a long time. I will be," he said. "And I want to say I'm sorry for misleading people and it was not intentional. That's all I'll say."

The conservative commentator wondered out loud if it was "always the plan" to go to war with Iran, saying "you don't want to be a conspiracy nut, but like, clearly, there were signs of low character, we knew that, but there are tons of people of low character who, like, outperform their character."
